Summer reading at its best!

Reading is a way for all of us to inhabit worlds other than the ones we live in every day. For the past thirty-five years, the librarians who create iREAD have chosen themes that take children and adults to faraway places, that introduce them to new concepts and ideas, that help them enjoy the pleasure of reading and the power of learning.

This year's theme, Reading by Design, is inspired by the creativity of authors, artists, builders, inventors, architects, everyone who makes our world a more interesting, livable, accessible, and beautiful place. In turn, we hope it inspires readers to explore their own creativity and design new worlds for themselves and for all of us.

One of the characters featured in the theme graphics for 2017 is Little Elliot, a two-foot-tall polka-dotted creation of author and illustrator Mike Curato. Little Elliot and his friend Mouse live by design, finding their own way in a world that's much bigger than they are, and where they don't always fit it. Their friendship and creativity combine to enrich their lives and expand their horizons.

For all summer readers, this year's theme introduces big ideas and invites creative responses. Ready, set, go...READ!

Artwork by Nick Dragotta from HOWTOONS: TOOLS OF MASS CONSTRUCTION by Dr. Saul Griffith, Nick Dragotta, Ingrid Dragotta, and Joost Bensen. Copyright © 2015 Howtoons LLC. All rights reserved. Used with permission.

Sometimes we think of creativity as limited to the arts, but it has just as big a place in the sciences. HOWTOONS[™], a brilliant series of do-it-yourself comics and projects, was created at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT)...by scientists, Saul Griffith, a graduate student at the time, and Joost Bonsen. Together they enlisted professional comic book artist Nick Dragotta and toy designer Ingrid Dragotta to help show kids basic principles of science and engineering as a way to be able to make fun stuff. Like ice cream, goggles, origami robots, soda bottle rockets or marshmallow shooters. All made mostly from things we usually throw away, so a little environmentalism is thrown in for good measure.

Griffith and the Dragottas believe that kids can create and invent better toys for themselves than they can buy. The instructions are cartoon graphics so they can pretty much be followed no matter what language you speak. The brother-and-sister heroes of HOWTOONS[™] (www.howtoons.com) have a sense of adventure and a can-do approach to their world.

This summer's Reading by Design theme is a natural for activities that unleash creativity and ideas. Kids like the stuff they can make. But even more importantly, they learn that with imagination and a few skills and tools, they can create things out of almost nothing, giving them an incredible sense of power. Showing kids not to accept the world for what it is, but what it can be.

Asking questions is the beginning of any adventure, project, or new undertaking. It's the only way to eventually find answers. In Ada Twist, Scientist, a new book with text by Andrea Beaty and illustrations by David Roberts, a young girl explores her world (and drives her parents slightly batty) by asking questions non-stop, once she finally begins to speak at age three.

Ada wanted to know how clocks work, why roses have thorns, and most of all, where smells come from, both good ones and bad. Along the way, Ada's questions led her to explore books, ideas, objects, and experiments that went far beyond the original query.

*Ada Marie did what scientists do:
She asked a small question,
and then she asked two.
And each of those led her to three questions more,
and some of those questions resulted in four.*

The scientific method—formulating and testing a hypothesis in response to your questions—is another approach to this summer's theme, Reading by Design: reading with a specific purpose. Ada is a great role model for summer readers. Reading will sometimes lead to answers, but the best part is when it leads to more questions, and the sense that the reader is empowered to continue their search.
